REFLECTIONS

At first, I felt a bit nervous. However, as the interview went on, I became more comfortable. It was a great chance to talk about my experience and share the projects I've worked on, especially in web development using technologies like Laravel, JavaScript, and front-end frameworks.

I'm happy that I was able to explain my skills and how I approach problem-solving. I think I showed my ability to learn, which is important for a web developer. Even when I wasn't sure about some technical questions, I tried to stay calm and answer clearly. I believe I managed to communicate my strengths well during the interview.

There are a few things I can improve on. For example, I need to get better at explaining complex ideas in simpler ways. Sometimes, I make things sound more complicated than they are, and I want to work on making my explanations clearer.
I also realized that I need to think faster when answering certain questions. Some questions made me think deeply, and I could have answered quicker if I had prepared more for those types of questions.

To improve, I plan to practice explaining difficult concepts in simpler terms. I will also prepare better for questions that require quick thinking. Additionally, I want to improve my understanding of certain tools and frameworks. When these were mentioned during the interview, I needed to think for a moment. I plan to keep learning and practicing with these tools, so I can talk about them more easily in the future.

Overall, I feel good about how the interview went, but I know there is always room for improvement. I will focus on the areas where I was less confident and continue working hard to improve.
